Appomattox is a growing town.

Blacksburg, Va.- Yellow poplar, one of Virginia's most versatile and valuable tree species, grows well in most counties in the state. Well cared-for stands of poplar, as shown above, will produce about 700 board feet of timber per year, or the equivalent of $12.00 per acre per year.

Growing Timber Is A Crop

Landowners throughout the state are urged to consider their growing timber as a crop. According to Forrest W. Patton, associate forester at VPI, yellow or tulip poplar is one of the state's most versatile and valuable woods. He points out that most of the furniture factories in the state depend on poplar as do veneer manufactures. Yellow poplar, contrary to belief, is a fast-growing tree. At first its growth is fairly slow, but after 20 years it picks up growth very rapidly. Land owners who have this valuable tree on their land should keep the trees in the woods until they are at least 16 to 18 inches in diameter on the stump. Trees smaller than 16 inches have little quality material in them and usually the market price is comparatively low.

Patton points out that by keeping trees until they reach a larger size the owner gets more money for the larger volume and higher quality.

In cutting poplar, the stands should not be clear cut. If a high volume must be cut, Patton advises that a few good trees be left on each acre to furnish seed to get another stand of poplar started.

The alternate cutting method is to select certain trees, only the slower growing and crowded trees leaving a good stand of timber to grow.

Landowners who have learned that timber is a crop can expect a return of $10 to $15.00 per year from their timber stands. More information is available from your county agent, Extension forester, or the Virginia Forest Service Forester in your area.

N. & W. OFFICAL APPEARS BEFORE HOUSE COMMITTEE

Roanoke, Va.- Stuart T. Saunders, vice president and general counsel of the Norfolk and Western Railway, this week told the House Ways and Means Committee in Washington that "restriction of foreign-produced residual oil would not work a hardship on anyone," but that the coal industry and the railroads were suffering severely from its unrestricted importation.

Saunders spoke in behalf of the three Pocahontas railroads — the N. & W., the Chesapeake and Ohio, and the Virginian—in support of an amendment to H. R. 1 fixing a quota on the import of such oil.

"I admit that it is a shortsighted policy which delegates the bituminous coal industry and the coal-hauline railroads to a stand-by status," he said. "It is a policy which might have tragic consequences in the event of another world-wide conflagration."

The official pointed out that the three roads now own enough freight cars and other facilities to handle 50 per cent more coal than they hauled last year and said that they could not be exnected to maintain surplus idle equipment over long periods.
